BACKGROUND

For over 80 years, The Edmundite Missions has walked alongside the people of Selma and surrounding communities, not just witnessing their struggles but actively participating in their triumphs. Now, we invite you to become part of a visionary initiative that will transform lives across the Black Belt of Alabama—a region rich in history and potential yet historically challenged by persistent poverty and limited economic opportunity.

A Seed of Hope Taking Root

Over the past three years, we've witnessed something remarkable: small-holder Black farmers in Lowndes, Wilcox, and Perry counties transforming their lives through increased agricultural capacity. Families who once struggled to make ends meet are now seeing meaningful increases in income. Children are growing up watching their parents build sustainable livelihoods from the rich soil of their ancestors. Communities are beginning to envision a future where economic dignity is possible.

Beginning in 2022, and with the support of foundations and major donors and in partnership with the Deep South Food Alliance, the Missions has provided on-farm development grants to 13 small and medium-sized farms with the objective of increasing production and product quality. Over the last three growing seasons, the effort has expanded production four-fold and increased incomes from farming by over 30%. This beta test has proven that a trusted, bespoke effort to meet these farmers where they are and support their growth can have economic results. Furthermore, those economic results have social consequences. That four-fold food increase was consumed on the tables of the communities in the Black Belt, improving nutrition in a region with some of the highest obesity, diabetes, and heart disease rates in the nation.

The objective now is to scale the effort into a structured program for as many as 40 farmers and make that structure a sustainable economic engine.
